Creating Military Power-Risa Brooks 2007-04-09

Creating Military Power examines how societies, cultures, political institutions and industrial base, and GNP—this volume takes a more expansive view. The study's overarching argument is that states' global environments and the particularities of their cultures, social structures, and political institutions affect how they organize and prepare for war, and ultimately impact their effectiveness in battle. The creation of military power is not only partial in nature; it is also material and human assets. Thus, military power and capital are the determinants of a country's ability to create military power, but equally important are the ways in which they are shaped by external constraints and pressures. The study of military power and capital is central to understanding how the state's exercise of external sovereignty is exercised in the political, social, economic, and military institutions.

The essays in the third volume, addressing issues of the state's exercise of external sovereignty, explore the changing roles and functions of regional security institutions. It examines the influence of regional security institutions on the political and security behavior of states.
